Excerpt of pertinent information:

Pg 2-3--During the next few months she tried to exchange her personal fortune and possessions for permission to leave the country but was unsuccessful. . . the police again called on her to tell her that they were entirely aware of her project. She was taken by them to a man, whom she later discovered to be Zaharia, who said she would not be hindered by the Rumanian police in her clandestine trip if she agreed to inform them of the activities of certain Rumanian exiles, principally General Nicolae Radescu and Mr. Nicolae Caranfil, now living in Paris. The alternative was prison for her family and for herself. She felt that she had no choice but to accept, and also thought that once in Paris she would be free, and in a position to speak with certain Americans with whom she was acquainted.

This is all the pertinent information on subject in this document.
